

Hello. There are strong emotions because we are hassled by junk emails at work and at home with no easy way to make them stop. They are able to steal our time, privacy, identifies? We receive mostly junk through the U.S. Postal mail and we've not real way to stop this. Yes, freedom of speech, but surely there is a line and they've crossed it. The one real haven and blessing has been know that I will not come home from work and have to wade through at least ten hang ups and/or messages from companies that I will never do business with because of their calls. I have to do this in order to know if there's a legitimate message there from someone I know and wish to hear from. If I do not want to wade through all of the junk, I must spend my very hard earned money on special devices to try to stop this. Is this right? What about those who haven't a hope to afford all of this?

No, something's wrong here. Please do not compromise on this act. It's the one haven many of us have. The one place we know that we've won over big business and those who would invade our lives. We see their commercials on television, hear them on radio, and now at the movies! We choose to turn on those devices or attend those theatres. But home, our person phones, should be at least one place where they cannot invade our lives. Should be the same with emails, too. My bank is National City Bank and I believe that they are on the list of those wishing to reverse the act, but I can find another bank that wasn't on the list. I have been loyal to them since I was a teenager, but loyalty works two ways.

Please help us to have some control over this invasion. Please. IF you do, bless you.

Take care and I hope you enjoy and value your privacy at night when you come home as I do. Afterall, think if we were allowed to contact you at your home every time we have something to say. Nope, not right. Take care and thanks.

From: chastainp@iquest.net